Not illustrated. 1900 Excerpt: .dispute between the Kew Observatory and the London United Tramways Company, it was mentioned in a note in our last issue that the double trolley system was in successful operation in America. The tramways referred to are at Cincinnati, and they were originally compelled to adopt this system by the telephone company, which successfully opposed their allowing waste current to leak into the earth. Over two hundred miles of track are thus equipped, and the managers find, after ten years running, that the cost of maintenance is considerably reduced in consequence. This seems in itself a sufficient answer to the London United Tramways Company, who urge that it is impossible to adopt the double trolley system. It is interesting to note that the advocates of earth returns are not in agreement amongst themselves. On the one hand, the London United Tramways Company claims that there is already a potential difference between their rails and earth, greater than the maximum accepted by Kew, due to leakage currents from the Central London Railway. On the other hand, The Electrician, in a note in the issue of January 1st, maintains that the return current in a deep level railway can not escape from the tunnel and rise to the surface in sufficient quantity to be observable by any but a mathematician. 7. An Appeal to the Practical Electrician for the Protection of Magnetic Observatories In an address delivered before the Electrotechnical Verein of Germany, Professor von Bezold makes a...
